Dissertation: When governments are fighting more than one rebel group, why do they negotiate peace agreements that include some, but not all, of their opponents? I argue that these settlements are best understood as counterinsurgency tactics against the excluded rebel groups. Governments that sign these agreements limit the number of war fronts across which they must divide resources. Many of these agreements also incorporate rebel soldiers into the national army and counterinsurgency campaigns, transforming former adversaries into conflict allies. By addressing public grievances, agreements can undermine civilians support for the remaining rebel force.
